Q: How to properly structure an async/await business task I am using async/await for the first time (yes, I know). I am not using it on my API methods that return HttpResponse, I'm just using it in an MVC 3 web app. I am able to successfully use it in a [HttpPost] method that has a [ValidateAntiForgeryToken] on the model. However, I'm not sure how to handle business-level tasks (validation, etc). I've seen using a [Route] attribute, but I'm not sure if that's the best way to do it. Let's say for example I had an enum in the database to indicate whether the property in the model was "required". Would I create a method such as ValidateModel()? If so, how would I mark it with the [Route] attribute? A: It is just one way to do it. If you are using async/await like you said, you don't have to think about it. But it can be useful if you want to split up into several methods and can't put every logic in one big method and synchronously call it from multiple async method, because you need control when to return. But I'm not sure if that would apply to your situation.

You can just place Route attributes on controllers and async methods within controllers. It will always be executed. But if you want your controller method to do some other things that are independent of async/await, you can use something like this in a controller. netbâ□□ul you will see there is no problem with the netbâ□□ul You can download and install and run netbâ□□ul as well In the web you can find no information, and when you download the netbâ□□ul from the website you get the message there is a Thing is netbâ□□ul doesn't show you what is going on with netbâ□□ul, so you need to run netbâ□□ul -s to get to the netbâ□□ul screen That's it, that's all there is to be said about netbâ□□ul, just have it installed, and use it So you can also
